Masirah Island, Oman – Although still considered one of the largest loggerhead rookeries in the world, this population is declining rapidly. I patrolled the beach at first light each day, hoping to encounter a straggling nester still on the beach at sunrise. Finally we found this giant, barnacle-encrusted, ancient-looking female. I knew as she entered the waves that my shot was in the surf, so I followed her in, ultimately sacrificing some of my gear to capture this image. © Thomas P. Peschak
